

Remote Work Eligibility Guidelines

Remote work eligibility is granted to employees who have completed their probationary period and meet specific requirements as outlined in this policy. Employees must complete a minimum of 90 days of employment before they can request remote status, which allows them to work from home or other off-site locations. As described under the Security Incident Response Plan, all remote workers are required to adhere to strict security protocols to protect company data and systems.

Remote work agreements are reviewed annually every January, as outlined in the Employee Handbook's section on Performance Management. During this review, employees' productivity, performance, and adherence to company policies will be evaluated. Remote workers must demonstrate that they can maintain their job responsibilities while working from home or other off-site locations. As part of this evaluation, remote work agreements may be adjusted or terminated if an employee fails to meet these expectations.

When requesting remote status, employees must complete the Vendor Onboarding Checklist and provide documentation of their home workspace, including a dedicated area for work and adequate internet connectivity. The company reserves the right to request additional information or documentation as needed. Remote workers are expected to maintain regular working hours and be available during core business hours, unless otherwise agreed upon with management.

Remote work eligibility is subject to change based on business needs and company policies. Employees must stay informed of any updates or changes to this policy by regularly reviewing the Employee Handbook and other relevant company materials. By granting remote work status, the company acknowledges that employees will be responsible for their own productivity and performance while working from home or other off-site locations.

As with all company policies, failure to comply with these guidelines may result in disciplinary action, up to and including termination of employment. Employees who are granted remote work status must understand that this privilege is not guaranteed and can be revoked at any time if the employee fails to meet the requirements outlined in this policy.